

Bringing back the workforce as you restart in a 'New Normal'

A few things to consider to Jumpstart Your Restart

It has been seven weeks since we began implementing social distancing measures to help fight the spread of the coronavirus. Those measures included forcing many businesses to reduce operations or to suspend them altogether. We all had to react quickly and unfortunately in many cases did not have a lot of time to prepare to reduce operations and as a result, many had to make quick decisions on reducing staffing levels.

Many Governors throughout the United States are working toward or recently announced a measured and phased approach to re-opening businesses. This will allow anyone whose operations have been impacted by COVID-19 to have a planned, effective restart and the opportunity to bring back employees in a more structured manner.

When considering how to bring back employees there are three central questions emerge from that one topic – how many employees do I bring back, when do I bring them back, and who do I bring back first?

READ MORE

Are you craving more information on how to adjust to the new normal? Have you been sifting through website after website to find the information you need? We've got you covered with our new podcast, "Jumpstart your Restart". Listen to the latest episode at the link below!

LISTEN HERE

Questions? Reach out to your Dean Dorton advisor, other professional advisor or email us at: info@deandorton.com